Learning Outcomes

The course covers the conditions of macroeconomic policy in a small open economy.

Upon completion of the course, students should be able to understand:

- how and why the efficacy of fiscal policy is dependent on the exchange rate regime of a country, as well as the degree of openness of capital movement
- the restrictions that apply to central banks and governments in formulating their monetary and foreign exchange policies
- the correlation between exchange rates and the price of assets expressed in different currencies
- the difference between nominal and real exchange rate, as well as how the latter changes over time
- the connections between the monetary policy of central banks and expectations on exchange rate and inflation
- the welfare theoretical balancing considerations of the central bank between inflation targets and employment stabilization targets
- and analyze the possibilities of individual countries to use either fixed or floating exchange rate as well as enter into monetary union with other countries.

Content and Form of Instruction

The course treats how the conditions of macroeconomic policy in an economy is affected by its degree of openness to international trade and capital movement. The traditional Mundell-Fleming models is used as a basis for analyzing various special cases, e.g. less than perfect capital mobility, fixed vs. floating exchange rates, static vs. rational expectations, the wage rate behavior of unions, etc. Different exchange rate models are discussed and related to the Mundell-Fleming model, e.g. the Dornbusch overshooting model, the portfolio balance model, and the supply-price model. The course also covers current issues of central bank policy, e.g. inflation- or price level targets, as well as how the outcome of the policies of central banks can be evaluated.

Instruction is in the form of lectures and seminars.
