- give an account of the human being as a gregarious social being and how this knowledge affects the practice of socio-spatial planning,
- give an account of social structures and their importance to groups and individuals in society,
- give an account of basic knowledge of inclusion and exclusion processes in society and how these can be understood in a socio-spatial planning perspective, and
- conduct a basic qualitative data collection.

Content

Sociological and socio-psychological theories on the relation between the individual, groups and society are treated. Special attention is given to understanding the human being in a social context, as a gregarious and social being, and its impact on the socio-spatial planning practice.

A central theme is the cultural and social determination of human action. The possible effects of social structures (e.g. class, ethnicity and gender) on individual options and their effects are discussed and problematised in terms of people in general and community planners in particular.

The course also deals with the issue of understanding contemporary society in terms of integration and inclusion, on the one hand, and segregation and exclusion on the other. Students apply some qualitative data collection methods.

Instruction is in the form of lectures, seminars and group discussions.
